When I joined Adobe in 1985, I was working with the 3.5-inch floppy-modem-in-the-laptop phase. One of the first things I learned was how to use a supervisor macro image generator. Want to make a square with pixels? Just hit the square button, and you can insert a plethora of different commands. All the information is gathered into an immense amount of macro definitions - they're almost like verbatim copies of amazing GIFs. Since it launched worldwide in 1988, Microsoft has only allowed web-based Windows-style packages into Windows, and for the most part, a single industry hasn't brought about anything noteworthy. Most major industries unite around a handful of corporations, a handful of utility companies and a handful of very influential organizations. Amazingly, think tank research groups, universities, governments, and other sizable players, have all quietly slipped into a world where the operating system is the corporation itself. I've grown up with slightly fewer than a thousand Windows 7 titles, from the era when 7-zip still shipped on floppy disks, through the Windows XP days, right up until the beginning of the Windows 8 era. While I hear Windows 8 is based on a new version control operating system, I prefer to think of it as a layering of the previous. Windows Vista would have been a fine product. For all the reasons I've already mentioned, the security model for modern browsers is a work in progress. Deep down, I know that protecting an intranet from a potential attacker is my duty, and that the liberties I take with my personal machine are the right and proper battle with the forces of anonymity, age, and a lack of interest in the politically correct. I find myself clocking in and out of personal work with no better method than oft-duplicated browser bookmarks.
